The exhibition “L’ombra che resta” opened on October 23rd in Milan at Spazio Milesi and marks the first edition of the project “Doppie” curated by Attilio Terragni and Chiara Smedile.

The works of the two emerging young artists, Jacopo Martinotti and Giorgio Mattia, meet and intertwine not merely in the architectural dimension but become a source of collective memory.

Inside the gallery a living dialogue takes shape, born from the resonance of different works, an evocation and invocation of memory; as the curator Chiara Smedile points out brilliantly: “The exhibition unfolds like a stratified landscape: bodies that are consumed alongside structures that undermine the authority of the visual; fragile apparitions coexisting with industrial ruins; memories that never close into a completed form, but offer themselves as open thresholds, luminous cracks, temporary constellations”.

Jacopo Martinotti transforms the materials he works with into living matter. In Eclisse (2020) the lost body of a film is rendered with marble dust, appearing and dissolving in space like a constellation. In Planetario (2024) he maps the external decorations of the celestial motions of the Ulrico Hoepli Planetarium. This series of black and white photographs give to the subjects, the stars, a very intense three-dimensionality as they seem to erupt from the frame, where the spectator is absorbed in a cosmic light.

If architecture is a static and monumental element, what Martinotti proposes is an ever-evolving movement, an unceasing gravitation between absence and presence, in which the memory becomes matter, appearing and disappearing, like a glow in the viewer’s gaze.

Giorgio Mattia sees the artworks as ruins, and it is precisely from this kind of dimension that memory develops.

His research starts with the Falck steelworks of Sesto San Giovanni and the steel industry, making his installations the results of this visual investigation. His works extend into space, such as S.T.G.M. (Sic Transit Gloria Mundi) (2025) and Viandante V (2025) and they project images that recall a once glorious past, now forgotten, evoking the resilience of the working class and the long-cherished industrial dream modernity has brought with it. The meticulous attention to details and the variety of the materials make these works relics, manufactures where steel comes to life, still protagonist of a dynamic yet fragile present that wants to be a source and an active device of a collective memory.

The next event of “Doppie” is Edoardo Manzoni’s exhibition “Sentimento Carsico”, opening on November 15th at the Novocomum historic building, bringing together both existing works and new productions by the artist.
